COVID-19 cases

The research is currently funded by the USask-led Global Water Futures program (supported by the Canada First Research Excellence Fund) through a project originally intended to measure environmental contaminants and which pivoted to focus on COVID-19 research. The work is also supported by in-kind contributions of equipment and personnel from the CofS. "The City of Saskatoon is pleased to have formed this partnership with the University of Saskatchewan team and the Saskatchewan Health Authority to help understand the prevalence of COVID-19 in the community," said Mike Sadowski, CoS wastewater treatment plant manager. Brinkmann said the research team hopes to expand their partnership with CofS and the SHA to provide more frequent estimates (three times per week) and expand to more cities in Saskatchewan.

"Right now, we're limited in what data we can produce," said Brinkmann. "If we had dedicated funding for this, we could increase the frequency of gathering and analyzing samples to three times a week, giving us more detailed information with which to perform a statistical analysis for potentially predicting new case numbers."

The USask approach has been validated by reliability testing organized by the Canadian Water Network (CWN)—a non-profit organization created in 2001 after the Walkerton, Ont. water contamination crisis.

Using a set of samples with known concentrations of the virus, laboratories across Canada compared different methods of analysis, and found the USask-developed method was accurate in detecting the virus at different concentrations. Giesy is a member of the CWN advisory panel which also includes virologists, epidemiologists and engineers.

Research into wastewater surveillance is underway in several places in the world. The USask method is also being used by institutions in Ontario, Texas and China.
